

Peer- reviewed Article

Bringing Normality Back in: Norms and Interests in Germany and Japan*

JO, Sam-Sang

The contemporary use of the term ‘abnormal’ describes people in a number of different categories, ranging from those who have committed extremely violent acts to those whose behavior might be described as eccentric. Nonetheless, Foucault does not necessarily regard abnormality as negative. In controlled quantities, abnormality is not entirely disruptive to society. In the Westphalian international system, some states can be referred to as ‘abnormal’ if they choose abnormal responses that might differ from those of normal states. For instance, Germany and Japan have emerged as a different kind of great powers, cultivating as low a profile as possible on foreign and security policy. But the history of German and Japanese abnormality is not a seamless one. Currently German and Japanese tendency towards the return to normality is more vivid. Germany’s power emboldens its leaders to turn away from multilateralism. Japan searches for a ‘normal state’ with a military or a great power status. Germany and Japan seem to be in the process of normalisation acquiring political and military power. This research attempts to explore what kinds of abnormal state Germany and Japan are, and whether there has been a fundamental shift to orient Germany and Japan towards embracing normality.

Keywords: German foreign and security policy, Japanese foreign and security policy, abnormality, normalization, normal state

Content

1. Introduction
2. Normality vs. abnormality nexus: norms, interests and nation states
3. The German normalization: from the abnormal state to the semi-abnormal state
 - 3.1 The cold war period
 - 3.1.1 Norm: antimilitarism based on consensus
 - 3.1.2 Interest: Gemeinwohl with the Western alliance
 - 3.2 The post-cold war period
 - 3.2.1 Norm: resilient antimilitarism
 - 3.2.2 Interest: just like the others
 - 3.3 The emergence of a disconcerting semi-abnormal state
4. The Japanese normalization: from the semi-abnormal state to the normal state
 - 4.1 The cold war period
 - 4.1.1 Norm: antimilitarism as a source of the dissociation of national identity
 - 4.1.2 Interest: the pursuit of a ‘merchant nation’
 - 4.2 The post-cold war period
 - 4.2.1 Norm: impaired antimilitarism
 - 4.2.2 Interest: the pursuit of common interests miscarried
 - 4.3 Wedging open the door to a normal state
5. Conclusion

*This paper, being originally presented at the International Studies Association International Conference, Hong Kong, June 15-17, 2017, was revised. I would like to express my special thanks to T. J. Pempel, Thomas Berger, and Stephen Nagy for their keen comments and support.

Instructor, Faculty of Letters, Chuo University.

1. Introduction

The contemporary use of the term ‘abnormal’, ‘deviant’, or ‘psychopath’ describes people in a number of different categories, ranging from those who have committed extremely violent acts to those whose behavior might simply be described as eccentric. Foucault viewed the word ‘abnormality’ not as reflecting a single characteristic, but rather a complex variety of psychological responses and reactions¹⁾. Foucault stressed its relativity in a sense that abnormality varies according to the circumstances, time, place, age, mental health of the individual, and even according to the social status of the person who does the defining. More importantly, as paradoxical as it seems, Foucault did not necessarily regard abnormality as a negative characteristic because those defined as abnormal often possess insights into the human condition that could be useful and productive. Much the same as Foucault pointed out, Dutton, deconstructing the often misunderstood diagnosis of those labeled as abnormal through bold on-the-ground reporting, also mentioned that in controlled quantities abnormality is not entirely disruptive to society and it has a positive characteristic in some fields (e.g. sports, politics, or business)²⁾. He put forward the argument that the abnormal activities of a minority of people are tailor-made for success in the twenty-first century and, furthermore, become imperative in all societies because those may contribute to social development and change by helping create the new and abandon the old norms.

In the current Westphalian international system where most of normal states are constitutionally able to deploy military force and attempt to maximize their national interests, some states can be referred to as ‘abnormal’ if they choose responses that might differ from those of most of normal states in identical situations³⁾. For instance, Germany and Japan have emerged as a different kind of great powers in the post-war period. In other words, they have become abnormal in a positive sense because they have cultivated as low a profile as possible on foreign and security policy matters by restraining willingly their modal personalities. They have been content with playing a secondary role on military issues, have been central players on economic issues, and have become world leaders on issues of environmental and aid policy. Maull argued that Germany and Japan have become “civilian powers” or “prototypes” of “a new type of international power” that have helped civilize international relations through the development of the international rule of law and stabilize region in Europe and East Asia and world as well⁴⁾. Even though a few states might be similarly described from time to time, history is not replete with examples of great power’s self-restraint. Thus, it is no exaggeration to suggest that Germany and Japan had been viewed as the ‘abnormal state’ par excellence.

But the history of German and Japanese abnormality is not a seamless one. Over the decades, there has been propensity precisely for Germany and Japan to escape from what has been abnormal for themselves. Almost seventy years after the end of World War II, German and Japanese implicit and explicit tendency towards the return to normality seems to be more vivid. As Angela Merkel’s tough response to the Euro crisis demonstrated substantially, Germany’s power seems to embolden its leaders to turn away from multilateralism and to pursue a more assertive and self-interested policy. In a case of Japan, Abe Shinzo—who passed without hesitation controversial new security bill, ‘collective self-defense,’ and laid out a timetable for revision of Japan’s peace Constitution—is searching for a ‘normal state’ with a military or a great power status in the world by using the theme ‘Japan is back.’ It seems that Germany and Japan are ‘finally’ in the process of normalization acquiring political, and probably military, power commensurate with its almost universally acknowledged great economic power.

This research attempts to explore what kinds of abnormal state Germany and Japan were/are, what have been the sources of abnormality, whether there has been a fundamental shift to orient German and Japanese foreign and security policy towards embracing normality, what have made Germany and Japan to strive to escape from what has been abnormal for themselves, and whether Germany and Japan can become ‘normal states’ with ameliorating the regional stability in Europe and East Asia. To answer these questions, the second chapter provides a theoretical framework. The third and fourth chapters explore the nature of abnormality and the path to normalization of German and Japanese foreign and security policy in the post-war and the post-cold war periods. The last chapter offers some reflections on some of the conspicuous remarks of German and Japanese normalization for the future of Europe and East Asia.

2. Normality vs. abnormality nexus: norms, interests and nation states

Such constructivists as Berger⁵⁾, Banchoff⁶⁾, Dierkes⁷⁾, Katzenstein⁸⁾, and Oros⁹⁾ etc. regarded Germany and Japan as ‘abnormal’ in that they relinquished their sovereign right to wage wars and to use military force as means of settling international disputes. According to them, peaceful cultural ‘norms’ are at the heart of German and Japanese abnormality. Their works have made an important scholarly contribution to understanding of German and Japanese abnormality. Nonetheless, despite the richness of their insights, there are the incompleteness and limitations in explaining their abnormality as following.

Firstly, the constructivists overlook or gloss over the another aspect—that is, interests—which is exerting influence on the state’s behaviors, while they regard norms as independent variable and treat interests as dependent variable being endogenous and socially constructed. In other words, as Krasner claimed, the constructivists have overemphasized the significance of international norms and have understated the importance of interests in global politics¹⁰⁾. Kissinger also mentioned that “nations have pursued self-interest more frequently than high-minded principle,” and “[t]here is little evidence to suggest that this... is likely to change in the decades ahead.¹¹⁾” It means that interests also can be perceived to be one of most important independent variables and vital elements concerned with the primary motivation and behavior of states. Secondly, the constructivists have tendency to regard German and Japanese abnormality as excessively or naively peaceful. Thus, they fail to figure out that there are the negative adjectives associated with Germany and Japan, including ‘hegemonic,’ ‘arrogant,’ ‘selfish,’ and ‘nationalistic.’ For instance, contrary to the constructivists’ expectations, throughout the Eurozone crisis, Germanisation of all Eurozone economies through austerity and structural reforms is inconsistent with the expectation that norm could restrain major increases in German power. Japan’s uncharacteristic assertiveness and unwillingness to compromise over territorial disputes and prime ministerial visits to Yasukuni Shrine undoubtedly do not match with its peace-loving image. In other words, in spite of the fact that the Germany and Japan have internalized antimilitarist norms since the Second World War, the very same norms have not prevent Germany and Japan from pursuing their national interests in the non-security fields, and if their national interests at stake were high, antimilitarist norms could become weakened. Thirdly, they are faulted for viewing ‘pacifist or antimilitarist’ Germany and Japan as an inherently identical group, thereby disregarding the different nature and degree of their abnormality. They cannot fully illuminate why it has become much more difficult for Japan to exercise abnormality than for Germany and why Germany’s endeavours to make it a peace nation have been more acknowledged and respected by its neighbors than Japan’s ones.

That is to say, a preoccupation with the norms is critically able to hinder understanding of a different character and level of abnormality in Germany and Japan, because the abnormality of state is not always the outcome of norms, but could also be of interests. In other words, with the a priori separation of norms and interests, we cannot achieve an adequate understanding of their abnormality¹²⁾. Ultimately, the concept of interests can add balance to prevailing trends of casting German and Japanese abnormality into purely normative terms. Nonetheless, it is not my goal to diminish the constructivism to the study of abnormality of Germany and Japan. On the contrary, this research upholds the assumptions that a focus on the interplay between norms and interests helps to better understand the historically and ideologically conditioned construction of abnormality and to define more comprehensibly the characteristics of abnormality and trajectory of normalization in Germany and Japan.

The nature of abnormality and the path to normalization of German and Japanese foreign and security policy can be sorted along two axes. The first axis is a measure of the norms in the security policy. At one extreme is the ‘militarist’ norm that the use of military force is regarded as the most important in ensuring the states’ survival and protection of sovereignty from external threats. Even Article 51 of the United Nations Charter clearly preserves “the inherent right of individual right or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member ...”¹³⁾. At the other extreme is the ‘antimilitarist’ norm that the use of military force should be prevented and disputes should be settled without recourse to violence. The arguably most important examples are Article 26 of the German Basic Law and Article 9 of the Japanese Constitution. The nature and trajectory of abnormality are also captured by the second axis, that is, the state’s interests in the foreign policy. At one extreme is the ‘national’ interest based on the determination to maximize the selfish interests without caring about the interests of any other country in international affairs. In this configuration, even international institutions may be merely instruments for maximizing and expanding its national interest. The economic means such as overseas development aid (ODA) is often adopted by state for accomplishing its national interests, which Baldwin calls as “economic statecraft.”¹⁴⁾ At the other extreme is the ‘common’ interest based on the motivation to make a greater contribution to the international community, largely without the calculation of benefit and cost. The common interest is associated with a reluctance to base foreign policy explicitly on national interest discourse and recognition of its long-term and universal benefits beyond the satisfaction of immediate national interests.

By expanding on the relationship between norm and interest, four groups, whereby normality vs. abnormality nexus is relationally constituted, can be illuminated so as to better understand the features of abnormality and pathway to normalization in Germany and Japan: normal state, semi-normal state, semi-abnormal state, and abnormal state (see figure 1).

<Figure 1> Types of Nation States

More specifically speaking, normal state in the international arena is characterized by a sovereign security and foreign policy, that is, not being constrained to use military forces and to pursue its own national interests¹⁵⁾. In particular, normal state attempts to maintain a sufficient military capability and is prepared to use it to defend or promote its security, containing “strategic culture” as a number of shared norms “within a given society that generate specific expectations about the respective community’s preferences and actions in security and defense policy”¹⁶⁾. Most of states in the world are normal states which live with a geographically bounded sovereign community and are armed with military, diplomats, ambition and national interests.

Semi-normal state refers to the entity whereby the state is distinguished by approval toward the use of force but pursuit of common interests. Whereas semi-normal state is not reluctant to participate in military missions and even to wage military conflicts, it adopts its identity in a practice of common interest. It is believed that military strength is the way to keep autonomy, but any selfish unilateral steps are avoided through the construction of multilateral cooperation or institutions. Semi-normal state would build an independent, full spectrum military that could use force, but it prefers itself to constrain its national interests and to maintain a multilateral cooperation with its neighbors. Members of EU, who are highly integrated in regional institutions, belong to this category.

Contrary to semi-normal state, semi-abnormal state means that state does not adopt strategy based on augmenting its traditional military power or territorial expansion, but it pursues economic interests with clearly instrumental strategies. Because the use of force for territory, honor, or prestige goes out of fashion and favor, it seeks to achieve prestige by increasing prosperity while limiting its exposure to power politics. Semi-abnormal state can be ascribed several other identities: a ‘merchant nation’¹⁷⁾, a ‘trading state’¹⁸⁾, an ‘economic’ power¹⁹⁾, a ‘middle power’²⁰⁾, ‘mercantile realism’²¹⁾, ‘postclassical realism’²²⁾ and ‘defensive realism’²³⁾.

Abnormal state is characterized by not only its unwillingness to play a militarist role in the management of international security but also its political will to build common interests with others in the pursuit of international/regional objectives and even to transfer its sovereignty to supranational institutions. Although it lives in anarchical international system and it is surrounded by power-maximizing ‘territorial states,’ abnormal state punches below its weight in its accounts and does not exercise its ‘influence’ or ‘control’ to any other country in order to maximize its national interests. Hence being an abnormal state is to demonstrate a distinct lack of instrumental, national interest-seeking practices, as well as the reticence of the use of force. Because of its compassionate attitudes, its foreign and security policy is perceived by other nations as nonthreatening at all. The best way to understand this abnormal state is the concept of ‘normative power’ in which the power cannot be enucleated to “either military or purely economic” means, while it “works through ideas, opinions and conscience”²⁴⁾.

Based on this theoretical framework, this research examines the inherent characteristics of abnormality, a proclivity for normality, a path to normalization and the future of abnormality in German and Japanese foreign and security policy in both the post-war and the post-cold war periods.

3. The German normalization: from the abnormal state to the semi-abnormal state

For the past 150 years, the German problems had dominated European history. Germany persistently had remained a focal point of unrest because it was too strong to be thoroughly integrated into the confines of Europe, but not strong enough to escape Europe and become a world power. In addition, pre-war Germany's ambiguous spiritual and strategic position between East and West, and its size in the center of the continent (Mittellage) as well, left Germany to be isolated and vulnerable and to become increasingly anti-Western, making it an inherently "destabilizing rather than a stabilising force in Europe"²⁵). To a certain extent, these factors created a precondition for rising of Nazi, that is, "the climax of the German rejection of the Western world"²⁶). Authoritarianism prevailed over democracy at home. Power politics dominated over commercial expansion abroad. Its fascist and military regime formed the military alliance, adopted autarchic policies, waged imperialist wars, and conducted brutally violent military campaigns in the territories they conquered, which escalated into a genocidal Holocaust²⁷). It is said that pre-war Germany was a "microcosm of the political developments as well as tragedies of the twentieth century"²⁸). Put simply, in the thirty-years war that defined world politics between 1914 and 1945, Germany, while seeking obsessed militarism and national interests, was revisionist power or super-normal state.

3.1 The cold war period

Post-war Germany had developed an abnormality which premised the rise of the 'culture of restraint.' Germany, blaming the armed forces for the failure of party democracy in the 1930s, was committed to the eradication of the old militarism, whereas Germany nurtured Gemeinwohl (common interest) within the multilateral networks of governance in preference to national interest. Germany's antimilitarism on the one hand and its self-restraint on national interest on the other, gave pause to standard interpretations of great power politics. And a sizeable body of scholarship claims that Germany, once at home in the realm of power politics, had emerged as a different kind of great power, now more concerned with the peaceful advance of multilateral networks of governance.

3.1.1 Norm: antimilitarism based on consensus

In the early post-war period Germany was overwhelmed by the task of trying to survive. In the midst of the chaos and misery the war had left behind, the primary concern of Germany as well as the international community was how to eradicate the old militarism in Germany in order to prevent the reemergence of a German militarism. It was imperative that Germany had to demonstrate that the new political systems differed from the old and its commitment to reticence toward the use of force was well-grounded. Germany's antimilitarism had expression in the Basic Law, so-called a 'peace Constitution,' promulgated in 1949. Specific evidence of the Basic Law's inherent reticence for the use of force can be found in Article 26 of the Basic Law which prohibited the Federal Republic from fighting wars of aggression, criminalizing "acts tending to and undertaken with intent to disturb the peaceful relations between nations, especially to prepare for a war of aggression"²⁹).

However, just one year after the ratification of Basic Law Germany was forced to rethink their antimilitarism because of the emergence of the cold war and, for that reason, the growing pressure from the United States. Under these conditions, the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) led by Chancellor Konrad Adenauer judged that they had no choice but to undo somewhat the antimilitary policy by pursuing West Germany's remilitarization and North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) membership to secure Germany from attack by the Soviet Union. Yet, the Social Democrats launched attacks on Adenauer's new security policy, being against rearmament and NATO membership in the name of 'peace' and putting instead a high priority on the reunification of the two German states and the neutrality that would serve as a bridge between the East and West. In spite of the Social Democrats' persistent opposition, the strict antimilitarism of the original Basic Law was soon overshadowed by Constitutional amendment pushed by Adenauer's majority government in 1954. The amendment, particularly implicating Article 79 (1), paved the way for Germany's remilitarization and NATO membership by making it easier for Germany to commit to international security institutions and regimes. At last, in 1955, Germany rearmed and joined NATO³⁰). Yet suffice it to say that the Constitutional provision did not mean the abandonment of antimilitarism. Rather it did just as much to ensconce Germany in the post-war antimilitarism in that Article 87 (a) empowered the newly formed federal armed forces to be used exclusively for the purpose of defending Germany and NATO territory and to be deployed "only to the extent expressly permitted by this Basic Law"³¹).

Meanwhile, at the Bad Godesberg conference of 1959, the Social Democratic Party (SPD) had accepted the necessity and value of German rearmament and NATO membership. What led them to agree to the principles of post-war German security policy shaped by the CDU, was the fact that the Social Democrats were not distrustful of the Christian Democrats' principles of security policy. Rather, there was considerable consensus among the Christian Democrats and the Social Democrats in that both of them were deeply suspicious of the armed forces and blamed them for the failure of party democracy in the 1930s. They viewed militarism as a destructive force that had to be contained, both domestically, through the marginalization of radical 'anti-system' forces, and internationally, through policies of engagement and integration into multilateral institutions. For fifty years after the end of the Second World War, deeply imbued with the antimilitarism which became the animating norm that guided the CDU and SPD's security policy, Germany had assiduously avoided the use of military power, had not made any deliberate effort to increase its power projection capabilities, and did not strive to assert itself once the cold war had routinized East-West relations. Germany had developed not only Constitutional constraints but also political mechanisms such as a democratic political control over the military. Germany's soldiers were to regard themselves as 'citizens in uniform' responsible for acts carried out under orders. Germany was characterized by an almost pacifist stance which planted deep roots, given the Bonn Republic's efforts to eradicate militarism³²). Germany had been relatively happy with this role, and so had its allies.

3.1.2 Interest: Gemeinwohl with the Western alliance

While it proved its commitment to reticence for the use of force, including the right to develop its own strategic deterrent or maintain an independent military structure, Germany laid the foundation for its post-war foreign policy of cooperation with its neighbors and its penchant for the Gemeinwohl by aligning Germany with the Western alliance, so-called Westintegration (European integration). The ambitious national interests of restoring the territorial unity of the country and of recovering the central role that Germany occupied on the European stage since its first unification in 1871 were subordinated to Gemeinwohl of aspiring to the stable peace order in Europe.

Adenauer had a clear understanding of how important to avoid a discourse of national interest and set about his Rhineland vision for Germany and Europe, that is, the European integration by transferring sovereignty to supranational organization. The underlying principle of his vision was to reassure Germany's neighbors that it could actively pursue Gemeinwohl in a new institutional context, and its intentions were benevolent. Adenauer's first step of the pursuit of Gemeinwohl was the Schuman Plan of 1950, which led to the creation of the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC). The second step that further enhanced the Gemeinwohl was the Treaty of Rome in 1957, which created the European Economic Community and set a goal of "an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe"³³). Both steps helped define German interests within the context of a larger, nascent European community of nations. At the Bad Godesberg conference of 1959, the Social Democrats—which until the late-1950s preferred to give priority to German unity as a state goal (Staatsziel)—had accepted the pursuit of Gemeinwohl as well as rearmament³⁴). It was only from the early-1960s that the major parties all moved towards a recognition of the pursuit of Gemeinwohl as a foundation of German foreign policy in Europe. A pursuit of Gemeinwohl remained an object of broad domestic consensus, itself relying on a supportive ‘permissive’ public opinion.

Germany as a ‘reflexive multilateralist’ had been remarkable and singular in its commitment to European integration. Embedded on the definition of the Gemeinwohl, Germany became much more benign and humble in its foreign policy behavior³⁵). In exercising its Gemeinwohl serving as a substitute and complement for national interest, Germany operated through a willing paymaster and within the Franco-German entente. Firstly, Germany’s commitment to Gemeinwohl was demonstrated well through its bescheid (modest) role as a paymaster for a Common Agricultural Policy (CAP)—and the EC Budget as well. The French suggestion in 1962 for CAP was disadvantageous to German interest. Given that France was a major producer of agricultural surplus and Germany a major importer of agricultural goods, the policy meant to export more French products without tariff barriers especially to Germany. Although CAP subsidies benefitted French farmers most, Germany had shown its commitment to the Gemeinwohl by considering the financial cost and the burden of its substantial contribution to the CAP subsidies as a kind of war reparation as the defeated nation in the Second World War³⁶). Secondly, Gemeinwohl was also presented through a zurückhaltende (reserved) foreign policy behavior toward France. The disastrous experience of unilateral attempts to exert German power in the first half of the 20th century had ruled against attempting to exercise an individual German leadership on prudential grounds. While France took the lead on the European scene, Germany accepted its unassertive role and was inclined to give a little more, and take a little less. Germany had no trouble in accepting its image as reserved, abnormal power which made the process of promoting common interests so successful.

3.2 The post-cold war period

Post-war Germany appeared to have come close to what others always wanted Germany to be: a peaceful nation without hegemonic pretensions that no longer threatened its neighbors. But, ironically enough, as soon as the German abnormality began to enjoy increased stability, the sudden fall of the Berlin Wall and the end of the cold war in 1989 led Germany to achieve a full recovery of German sovereignty over its own divided territory, so-called ‘national normality’ and put Germany, not France, at the center. Although in the beginning it was perplexed as to what to do with its national normality and Mittellage position, Germany in the mid-1990s began gradually to advance the normalization by deploying its armed forces for purposes other than the defense of German or NATO territory. Germany also ushered in the normalization project, seeking its own national interest as the core state in Europe and asserting unreservedly German rights within the EU.

3.2.1 Norm: resilient antimilitarism

The end of the cold war, Germany expected, would allow itself to continue to enjoy a benign security environment because it was shifted to a country encircled by friends from a front-line state in a divided Europe. However, Germany had come under the pressure from its allies, especially the US, to take greater responsibility (Verantwortung) for international peace and security—even though some in Europe worried about the power of the new, reunified Germany. Two events in the 1990s—the Gulf War and the Kosovo War—pressured to modify Germany’s antimilitarism forged during the previous 40 years. Then German elites began to engage into the most intensive debate on the normalization of the new Berlin Republic³⁷). The Christian Democrats had suggested the idea of competence for the alliance (Bündnisfähigkeit) which was associated with normalization, implying the ability to fulfill commitments as a member of NATO. Karl Lamers, foreign-policy spokesman of the Christian Democrat parliamentary group, for instance, using the concept of ‘normalization’ before anyone else, argued in August 1990 that Germany should accept that the military power plays a role even in today’s world and become a normal member of the international community. However, like the 1950s, the Social Democrats along with Greens rejected the Christian Democrats’ new normalization approach, seeing in it a danger of ‘remilitarization.’ After tremendous internal political debates and struggle, in July 1994 the Constitutional Court, grounded on Article 24 (2) of the Basic Law, ruled that, in favor of the Christian Democrats, the armed forces’ participation in any ‘out-of-area’ operations sanctioned by the UN subject to Bundestag approval could be Constitutional as long as they took place under UN auspices and were approved by the Bundestag. Then, in July 1995 German forces were authorized for the first time since the Second World War to use military force if possible in order to separate the warring parties in Bosnia.

Although many Social Democrats and Greens feared a ‘normalization’ of German security policy, some members of the ‘realist’ faction in Green party, that is, former cold war peace activists including Joschka Fischer, began to reconsider their antimilitarism and embrace the idea of humanitarian intervention. The catalyst for their fundamental change of attitude on the issue of military intervention was the massacre of Bosnian Muslim males by Serbian forces in Srebrenica in 1995. Fischer came to accept the Christian Democrats’ normalization approach. At last, in 1999 Fischer as Foreign Minister made the case to deploy German troops in a combat zone in Kosovo as part of Operation Allied Force (OAF) in conjunction with its NATO allies. Since then, the Bundeswehr has contributed to an array of military operations over a wide geographical area: the ISAF mission, KSK mission in Afghanistan as part of Operation Enduring Freedom, ESDP/CSDP missions in Africa, and maritime security operations in the Mediterranean and off the Horn of Africa etc.

The participation in the OAF seemed to be a ‘watershed’ in Germany’s antimilitarism in that a traditional German reticence to the use of force had been overcome and the Berlin Republic security policy was based on the normalization³⁸). The normalization to security policy and a cross-party consensus were formalized in the *White Paper 2006*³⁹). It mentioned for the first time that protecting German interests such as free trade and energy security could be tasks for the German military. It also justified that “missions to prevent conflicts and to cope with crises” were to be the primary tasks of the Bundeswehr. Yet, since Guido Westerwelle became Foreign Minister under Chancellor Merkel’s second term, Germany has failed to nurture and sustain its normalization, stopping the weakening of antimilitarism. Westerwelle, for instance, had discovered the ‘risks’ of humanitarian military intervention. Thus, the Merkel government has remained reluctant to deploy German troops abroad and resisted especially US pressures on it to provide more troops to join the fight and step up its overall engagement. In this context, Germany refused to join its key NATO allies in enforcing UN Security Council resolutions on Libya in 2011, and it was unwillingness to participate in tackling the problem of Syria's chemical weapons. In the fight against Islamic State it sends kit but no soldiers. In the Ukraine crisis Merkel has ruled out arms shipments or any military response. Faced with the turmoil and instability around Europe’s borders arising from the negative fall-out of the Arab Spring and a more assertive Russia, Germany has exposed its weaknesses of strategic culture that created consternation among its closest allies and partners. In other words, it becomes apparent that there remains still substantial antimilitarism which plays a role as political and logistical brakes on Germany's willingness and ability to consider high-intensity military deployments around the globe. Negative trends in defense spending, the slow pace of defense reform, too little action to realize normalization, no political will to expand its military forces on the scale that nearly all of its allies are hoping for, and its quiet trial to build a European Army sharing Germany's resources with smaller countries also demonstrate how resilient antimilitarism is in Germany.

3.2.2 Interest: just like the others

Germany's pursuit of Gemeinwohl through the European integration was a constant in its foreign policy throughout the cold war. However, the collapse of Soviet rule throughout Eastern Europe in 1989 led to the Constitution of a quite different kind of Europe with radically altered political opportunity structures. Unlike realists' expectation that Germany might seek to exploit this opportunity to pursue its national interests and to abandon its commitment to further integration and to Gemeinwohl, in the years immediately following German unification, there was no normalization movement and rather the thrust was towards ever closer union around an even more explicit Gemeinwohl. When the euro was launched on schedule on 1 January 1999, Germany's pursuit of Gemeinwohl seemed to have worked in that the German question, which had been reopened by the fall of the Wall, appeared to have been resolved.

Yet, underneath this apparently tranquil surface, the normalisation, that is, a process of erosion of German commitment to pursuing Gemeinwohl through European integration was already taking place. In other words, it became increasingly clear that the enormous costs of reunification along with the unfavorable demographic profile (low birth rate and an ageing population), generous and expanding social welfare payments and the competition created by globalization had had a pervasive effect on Germany's European policy, exhausted the Germany's willingness to sacrifice a part of its national interests for the rest of Europe, and caused inevitably to weaken a symbiotic relationship between national interest and Gemeinwohl and its pronounced Bescheidenheit (modesty) and Zurückhaltung (reserve) in diplomacy as well.

Firstly, Schröder initiated the normalization, emphasizing on German national interests and claiming German rights within the EU without serious reservation, that would have been impossible for predecessors. For instance, in the Bundestag in 1998 Schröder stated: "We cannot and will not solve the problems of Europe with a German checkbook"⁴⁰⁾. His remark meant that given the budgetary realities of the German state after reunification, the era of generous German side payments and cheque book diplomacy ended and Germany would be 'leaner and meaner', in particular, during a continuing process of enlargement which necessarily would lead to heightened distributional struggles⁴¹⁾. This development has been demonstrated clearly in Merkel's response to the Euro crisis. Merkel's reaction started with her insistence that the crisis was not the European problem but a just Greek problem. Thus, Germany became the most prominent obstacle to the creation of shared banking resolution funds, common deposit insurance, and mutualized sovereign debt instruments. Germany to whom Bescheidenheit did not matter was more inclined to fight for its national interests⁴²⁾.

Secondly, Germany's zurückhaltende foreign policy behavior toward France was no longer as conspicuous as the past. According to Kornelius, Germany's reserved attitude toward France did not appeal to Merkel⁴³⁾. Merkel rejected France's Growth and Employment Pact, imposing coercively its convictions on a number of important points including the participation of the IMF, the adoption of the Fiscal Compact and the intergovernmental character of the European Financial Stability Facility giving Germany full control of its operations and a strict conditionality. Given that France was unable to wield its influence on, and to tame, Germany, it was quite unavoidable for France to follow Germany's determination. It meant an almost complete victory for German positions over French ones⁴⁴). It represented the materialization of a new type of Franco-German asymmetry, a powerful position of Germany and the end of Zurückhaltung in diplomacy. As Beck had coined as 'Merkiavellism'⁴⁵), Germany gained political leverage against the elites of France.

3.3 The emergence of a disconcerting semi-abnormal state

Post-war Germany which found itself occupied by four victorious allied powers had become introverted not only because of the scale of the destruction it had suffered in the war, but also because of shame over its role in starting and fighting the war. This awareness led Germany to choose to be an abnormal state on the eastern edge of western Europe (Grenzlage), through developing a commitment both to the reticence toward the use of force in the security field and to Gemeinwohl in the relationship with its neighbors. In spite of the fact that it was vulnerable to the Soviet threat, for nearly half a century the antimilitarism and Gemeinwohl were supported not only by large segments of Germany's political and economic elites but also German public. In this sense, until reunification in 1990, Germany was a 'perfect abnormal state' that was "dependent on its allies for protection against the Soviet threat and inhibited by the history of the Second World War from defining or explicitly pursuing its own national interests"⁴⁶). Germany's abnormality had brought Europe great peace and prosperity, helping greatly overcome Europe's bloody past and removing the fears of a revival of German threat to its neighbors, especially France.

However, the rise of Germany as a result of the end of the cold war and German reunification in 1989 raised concerns about the resilience of Germany's abnormality. The presage that the fall of the Wall would be to reinstate Germany as "the natural hegemon of any European political system" was widely perceived⁴⁷). In the face of its neighbors' uneasiness, Germany embraced itself thoroughly in a European structure, being convinced that European unity had to be made 'irreversible' before another generation came to power on whom the horrible events of the Second World War would not be personally imprinted. Nonetheless, the genocide in the Balkans in 1995 galvanized Germany to be engaged in the normalization in security policy. New cross-party consensus about the normalization based on ideas of humanitarian intervention and the role and purpose of the Bundeswehr began to form. In this sense, Germany in this period became shortly a semi-normal state which is distinguished by an approval for the use of force and a practice of common interests. Nonetheless, since 2005 Germany, which is still wary of its history as a military power, has not any more fostered its normalization in the security policy.

Meanwhile, since 1998 the new boldness in the emphasis of the national interests—that is, normalization—has emerged. Germany has been "enjoying the return to normality as a nation-state"⁴⁸). Germany's Gemeinwohl already began to change in an enlarged country preoccupied with its own problems. German reunification resulted in an untenability of Germany's Gemeinwohl embodying European integration. Then, Germany, if necessary, has proceeded alone (Alleingang) rather engage in exhaustive consultation as shown throughout the Euro crisis, taking on a leadership role through making political effort to shape European integration in accordance with German own images and interests. It appears that having reached the end of a 'long path to the west,' Germany becomes once again 'just like the others' with its own interests and ambitions. The normalization of German foreign policy has led Germany to become the ‘center,’ while others seem to come to be ‘periphery’ which remains disempowered. What Europe has been experiencing has been not Europeanisation but Germanisation of all Eurozone peripheral economies through austerity and structural reforms and, at the same time, a creation of a new governance framework for the Eurozone, which was essentially an extension of the German view of capitalism. It means that Germany has been gradually experiencing a transition from a relatively comfortable abnormal state through a short-lived semi-normal state to a disconcerting semi-abnormal state.

4. The Japanese normalization: from the semi-abnormal state to the normal state

Throughout the past 150 years, the Japanese problem much the same as German case also has prevailed East Asian history because Japan incessantly embarked on a frenzied path of Westernization to ‘escape from Asia’ on the other hand, and it considered its East Asian neighbors to be backward and to be cast off on the one hand. A complicated and ambivalent relationship with the West and East Asia led Japan to face its “ambiguous identity (aimaisa)”⁴⁹⁾ asking whether it was part of the West, or rather of Asia: “Japan vacillated between insisting on being not Asian at all, and declaring itself the epitome of Asianness”⁵⁰⁾. Despite Japan’s initial proven record of Westernization, Japan was hypocritically excluded from the Western community in the context of the permanent racial superiority of the West over ‘yellow race’ Asians. This culminated in the arrival of militaristic authoritarian state—whose conducts engendered Nanjing massacre—bent on territorial expansion and maximization of national interest as non-status quo power or super-normal state.

4.1 The cold war period

Post-war Japan was reborn as a new democratic country being timid and reactive in its foreign and security policy, thereby leading to a greater sense of abnormality. Japan relinquished the use of force for settling international disputes and the right of belligerency. Japan minimized its military role by forming an alliance with the United States that entailed only minimal involvement in its cold war strategy. Japan, which lacked any intention and ambition to engage in power politics, had not asserted itself in foreign policy as much as expected, rather pursuing a self-effacing diplomacy. Meanwhile, Japan concentrating on economic growth under the aegis of the United States promoted deliberately and consciously Japanese national interests for the accumulation of wealth which was labeled ‘mercantile realism’⁵¹⁾.

4.1.1 Norm: antimilitarism as a source of the dissociation of national identity

Japan’s defeat in World War II, the trauma of atomic bombing, widespread fears of a militarist revival and unwillingness to divert resources from economic reconstruction compelled the Japanese to make a commitment to antimilitarism. The prime axiom demonstrating its antimilitarism was the US-written peace Constitution Article 9 in which the state relinquishes its sovereign right to wage wars and to use force or the threat of force “as means of settling international disputes,” and establishes that it will not maintain “land, sea, and air forces, as well as other war potential”⁵²⁾. The promulgation of the war-renouncing Constitution meant that Japan recognized that it was not ‘normal.’

However, the emergence of the cold war soon let the US to regret and reconsider the peace Constitution. Then, similar to German situation, the US forced Japan to reverse the peace Constitution which meant the weakening of antimilitarism. Under American hegemonic pressure, Yoshida Shigeru, taking the centrist and pragmatic position, felt he had no choice but to reverse, at least partially, the antimilitarism, by accepting both the formation of a 75,000 Japanese National Police Reserve, which evolved into the Self-Defense Forces (SDF), and the 1951 US-Japan Mutual Security Treaty⁵³. Yoshida's primary goal was to eschew the pursuit of military power but to permit an exclusively defensive force through taking a 'free ride' on the US patronage for Japan's security. Based on the Yoshida doctrine, in May 1957 the Cabinet Legislative Bureau issued the Basic Policy for National Defense to confirm the exclusive defense doctrine (senshuboei). It had continued to be the basis of the antimilitarism throughout the cold war⁵⁴. The majority of Japanese had supported the post-war antimilitarism. The SDF had never been very popular, and for that reason had been remarkably invisible. The Japanese people were keen to maintain tight civilian control of the military as well⁵⁵. In addition, any efforts to change Japan's antimilitarism were restrained and most Japanese citizens shivered at the thought of weakening the antimilitarism and returning to a 'normal state.' Successive administrations since the 1960s had maintained the position that Japan under the peace Constitution should not mandate it to take military measures in the face of challenges to peace, security and national survival, and thus it retained the right of self-defense (jieiken).

Nonetheless, the Japanese antimilitarism was caught in the discrepancy between a 'peace' state in line with the Constitution and remilitarization in line with the 1951 US-Japan Mutual Security Treaty. In contrast to German antimilitarism which was based on considerable consensus, the Japanese antimilitarism had been a source of "the ideological cleavage between revisionists and lefts" and "the dissociation of national identity"⁵⁶. Revisionists were dissatisfied by the peace clause which prevented Japan from playing a sufficient military role either independently or in alliance with the United States, while lefts were annoyed by the fact that the SDF, by cooperating with the United States, severely distorted the peace clause. Notwithstanding, Japan had failed to find the consensus, either by modifying the Constitution to make it more consistent with Japan's actual security policy or by modifying its security policy in a way that was more clearly consistent with the Constitution.

4.1.2 Interest: the pursuit of a 'merchant nation'

Under the American overwhelming authority and occupation, Japan, which was forced to find new ways to pursue its national interest that should not clash with American interest, regarded its urgent and short-term national interests as rebuilding its destroyed economy and ending the U.S. occupation as soon as possible. After the American occupation ended, Yoshida provided his country-men with a concept of a 'merchant nation' (shonin kokka)' so that Japan could achieve the long-term national interest to create a more prosperous and modern Japan⁵⁷. Although Japanese society was divided concerning the antimilitarism, there was a clear consensus on its primary national interest. In 1960, Japan's focus on economic interest as a national goal was symbolized by the 'income doubling' strategy adopted by Hayato Ikeda. This approach bore fruit as the amazing economic growth not only improved the living standards of Japanese but also transformed Japan's image from that of a humiliated loser in the Second World War into that of a dynamic Western democracy.

Although the orientation of post-war Japan's foreign policy changed into a self-effacing diplomacy, Japan applied the mercantile approach to its foreign policy towards East Asia, following a clear and single-minded economic interest which was largely subject to "its ever-expanding economic muscle"⁵⁸. Its pursuit of the expansion of its national interests through 'economic diplomacy' was based on an underlying assumption that Japanese economic assistance to its neighbors could result in deepening common interest and reconciliation as well⁵⁹). However, a close-minded nationalism and arrogance were deeply rooted in the pursuit of its economic interests and a hope for building common interest with East Asia through economic assistance and interdependence. Such beliefs were manifested in the overseas development assistance (ODA) and the ‘flying geese model’ in East Asia.

Firstly, although it had not used its economic power more assertively for greater benefit and political purpose, since its own economic rise in the 1960s Japan had used the ODA within its exclusive economic interests, taking advantage of its economic dominance in the region as other states began desperately seeking to revitalize their own economies⁶⁰). It harmonized the ODA with the needs of its industry so as to produce an amiable investment environment for Japan’s transnational corporations. Meanwhile, because Japan, while being still crept by exclusive nationalism, believed its colonial rule to neighbors as ‘benevolent,’ it refused to characterize the economic aid to its neighbors as compensation for its invasion—in contrast to Germany which regarded the financial cost to the CAP subsidies as a kind of war reparation. Instead, it assumed that helping East Asian countries to modernize them with ODA would generate mutually economic growth, mutual economic growth would increase interdependence between them, and interdependence would enhance common interest and ‘friendship’ with them and heal their wounds caused by Japan’s wartime invasion⁶¹). For decades, such assistance was indispensable to East Asian countries’ economic growth and development, in particular, helping China to achieve its reform and openness. Yet, in spite of the ODA on a massive scale given to its neighbors, economic assistance and interdependence within Japan’s economic interests, unlike Japan’s expectation, did not act as a stimulus for enhancing common interest and reconciliation.

Secondly, Japan believed that given its political and economic asymmetry, Japan, rather than China, had to be the leader of East Asia⁶²). Japan, for instance, sought a path to leadership in East Asia through the flying geese model as “Japanese foreign assistance, trade, production networks, and bank loans became increasingly pivotal in advancing the economic fortunes of much of East Asia”⁶³). On the other hand, the assumption of Japanese superiority in all spiritual, cultural, and material spheres over other East Asian nations, claiming Japanese special leadership in East Asia, lay behind the underlying motives of the flying geese model, which stuck still around the Greater East Asian Coprosperity Sphere in the 1930s and 1940s⁶⁴). Thus, the flying geese model was destined to the general effect of feeding national interests in East Asia rather than encouraging to create common interests.

4.2 The post-cold war period

The first half of the 1990s became a watershed moment for major shift of its abnormality. Internationally, the dismantling of cold war international structure placed more emphasis on an active political role for Japan in world politics. Regionally, the rapid growth of China began to challenge Japan which had been accustomed to a weak East Asia where Japan played comfortably a role as an economic leader. Domestically, a fundamental regime shift, that is, the collapse of so-called 1955 system, heralded the country’s movement toward establishing a new system with considerable political uncertainty. Those events, which coincided with the bursting of Japan’s asset bubble in 1990-91 and the entering in ageing society, became a new, more complex and demanding challenge to Japan. In the face of this challenge, Japan was not successful to use to good advantage toward a future direction. This failure had a lasting negative impact that was destined to haunt Japan, eventually letting more nationalistic, assertive, and self-assured leaders to push forward the normalization in Japanese foreign and security policy.

4.2.1 Norm: impaired antimilitarism

A crucial period for Japan's reconsideration of antimilitarism was the first half of the 1990s. It started with the Gulf War, which tested Japanese aversion to the use of force under the emerging new international environment. Japan contributed its generous $13 billion in support of U.S. actions in the 1991 invasion of Iraq, but it caused just Japanese humiliation to the overt U.S. disdain. After the Gulf War, the Diet belatedly enacted the PKO law in 1992, enabling the SDF to join in peacekeeping operations under the auspices of the United Nations (UN). This law, setting a legal procedure to authorize sending the SDF abroad, broke the exclusive antimilitarism of keeping troops at home and signaled the normalization in the security field⁶⁵. Nonetheless, the normalisation was limited given the fact that Miyazawa Kiichi—a leader of the LDP mainstream faction as an adherent of the long-standing Yoshida doctrine—“advocated more active participation in peacekeeping operations only under the constraint of the Constitution” and emphasized the larger framework of a multilateral security system⁶⁶. Suffice it to say that there was a continuation of the antimilitarism in that Japan was still committed to Article 9 and antimilitarism.

Since the late-1990s the policies conducted by the erstwhile pragmatists and adherents of the Yoshida doctrine during the first half of the 1990s were replaced by self-assertive policies, and Japan has gradually made substantial institutional and normative progress toward the normalisation. For instance, the realm of Japan's military actions under the system of the US-Japanese security alliance has been expanded. Domestic discourse on security policy has been shifting away from earlier, almost theological debate about the Constitutionality of maintaining armed forces to the practical desirability of specific policies⁶⁷. And the revision of peace Constitution has been openly discussed and in May 2017 Abe has unveiled plans to revise Japan's post-war peace Constitution by the year 2020 when Tokyo is set to host the Olympic Games. More specifically speaking, a number of events and processes can be referred to as evidence of Japanese normalization: the passing of a cluster of national emergency bills that establish comprehensively how to respond to a direct attack; the dispatch of troops to the Indian Ocean in 2001, Iraq in 2004, Somalia in 2009, and Sudan in 2015; the transformation of the Defense Agency into a full-fledged Ministry of Defense; the provision of the SDF conventional capabilities to respond to guerrilla incursions; the introduction of Ballistic Missile Defense; the introduction of intelligence satellite program; the introduction of Japan's National Security Strategy, National Security Council, State Secrecy Law, Complicity Law; increased defense budgets; the breach of the ban on the exercise of the right of collective self-defense; the claim of a right to intervene in the Korean peninsular and the Taiwan Strait; the proposal to develop the ability to strike preemptively at the missile facilities of North Korea, and a military exercise alongside the US in the Sea of Japan to put pressure on North Korea to halt its ballistic missile program. The general trends of what have happened can be characterized as Japanese normalization in the security policy.

Japan's slow but irreversible normalization process coincides with the decline of the lefts and the rise of neo-nationalists, so-called the trend of ‘the rightward drift’ (Ukeika) in Japanese politics⁶⁸. The left's political power, which was for a long time a core organized political opposition to the use of force and Constitutional revision, had declined considerably during the 1990s. Meanwhile, after the end of the Cold War period with the collapse of the Japanese economic bubble, the LDP ‘mainstream factions’ faltered and the anti-mainstream, whose vision for Japan derived from a tradition of revisionism, was able to regain power in the guise of Mori's faction which meant the final breakdown of Japan's post-war 1955 system and the return of the descendants of the Kishi faction—including Koizumi Junichiro between 2001 and 2006 and Abe for his two terms in office—to capture power. During Koizumi and Abe's premiership Japanese domestic politics has gone through a major transformation characterized by enhanced nationalism and prime ministerial power whereas bureaucratic autonomy and the power of the Left were in decline. Koizumi and Abe, who are more revisionist in their stand and less troubled by the antimilitarism held by their predecessors, have accelerated the process of the normalisation. They have been energetically seeking an enhanced role for Japan's military and a much closer and more explicit overlapping with U.S. strategic planning, and have been, in their enthusiasm, adopting a more assertive, self-assured high-profile line to its neighbors such as China and North Korea. In particular, despite protestations that Abe is pragmatic in outlook, it is clear that his security policies including the full-fledged exercise of the right to collective self-defense and a plan to seek a first-ever change to the post-war Constitution underpinned by a strong revisionist ideology are bringing about loosening Japan from the historical limits and the decades of post-war taboos and breaking Japan's earlier 'culture of antimilitarism,' leading to shift Japan onto a normal state.

The normalization was also prompted and justified by the potential threats of the assertive China and a belligerent North Korea. The Taiwan Straits crisis in 1996, China's burgeoning military power, China's enhanced maritime power in and around the East China Sea, the territorial dispute over Senkaku/Diaoyu Islands and maritime rights, anxiety about China's intentions toward Japan, the emotions about North Korean abductions, and the tests of North Korean missiles and nuclear bombs have led many Japanese policymakers to perceive China and North Korea as potential threats causing seemingly instability in East Asia and, then, have prompted Japanese revisionists—who are taking advantage of using the perception of the China and North Korea threat for their ambitions to emerge as a 'normal state'—more leverage to breach the antimilitarism and to push normalization⁶⁹).

4.2.2 Interest: the pursuit of common interests miscarried

The virtual end of the cold war brought a more favorable situation for Japan to review the kind of role it would play in the regional structure and to find common interests with its neighbors. Furthermore, the economic interdependence and cohesion of East Asia seemed to be accelerating amid growing need for new forms of cooperation. Japan became increasingly eager to seek common interests with its neighbors by forming the regional institution and fostering a reconciliation with its neighbors. Specifically speaking, Japan's positive role in the region building was unmistakable, as the engine of growth for other Asian economies and the leading role in forming the regional economic consultations for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC), a new regional institutions such as the ASEAN + 3 and the currency swap arrangements set out in the Chiang Mai Initiative. In addition, the Japanese government took some decisive steps towards atonement for its past historical aggression against, and reconciliation with, its neighbors in the first half of the 1990s: Murayama Tomiichi expressed clearly "feelings of deep remorse and state my heartfelt apology" for Japan's twentieth century history, arguing strongly for reconciliation with China and South Korea⁷⁰). Moreover, the Japanese help to bail out its neighbors during the 1997 crisis and Obuchi Keizo's encouragement of China's membership to the WTO in 1999 were the symbolic events that at last Japan seemed to become an abnormal state in foreign policy, establishing its national interest within the regional framework.

However, Japanese efforts to seek common interests miscarried, being coincident with the weakening of antimilitarism. Needless to say, when Japan's bubble economy burst, "the positive conditions for searching common interests began to deteriorate"⁷¹). This is also a result not only of Japan's too high expectation based on assumption that deep-seated historical issues could be resolved on the basis of economic assistance and interdependence, but also of Japan's recognition that China was a destabilizing force in the region in which the flying geese formation pattern could not proceed as smoothly.

Firstly, Japan assumed that its sincere endeavor to become a peaceful nation, a substantial amount of ODA and development of economic interdependence during the cold war would give its neighbors, in particular China, an impression that the path to promote common interests and reconciliation was near. However, it turned out that Japan's assumption was naive in a sense that it proved illusory when Japanese became aware that China, and other countries, accepted Japan's economic assistance with lack of appreciation and, furthermore, interdependence with its neighbors was complicating Japan's economic interests. Because the Japanese economy was now more extensively intertwined with China's domestic market, Japanese manufacturers located in China became often targets of violence and its economic interest was hurt by the Chinese use of economic instruments of leverage⁷²). As interdependence became uncomfortable and tensions with China have steadily multiplied, popular sentiment in Japan has grown more skeptical of China, making Japanese government to promote common interests more difficult, despite its shared economic interests with China, and compelling its leaders to take a more realistic and proactive foreign policy.

Secondly, Japan held on to rosy expectations of integrating China into a Japan-led regional system and promoting common interests, assuming primarily that China was bound to remain backward for the foreseeable future, incapable of challenging Japan's economic power. However, Japan, experiencing the bursting of its asset bubble, came to be disturbed by a great shift in East Asia from the Japan-led flying geese model to the China-led development model as a result of the rise of China, implying that Japan's regional economic muscle was considerably reduced and its strategy to use China as a major vehicle for its rise was totally derailed. China has increasingly used the China-led development model and regional framework to advance its influence throughout the neighborhood, challenging Japan and colliding with Japan's enhanced sense of realism. It means that China's regional and global influence seemed to eclipse Japan's international standing, and in Japan, China was viewed more and more as an antagonistic rival⁷³). In order to counter the rise of China, Japan reshaped its regional policy from an ASEAN-led 10+3 approach to an ASEAN-led 10+6 and US-led TPP approach. Japan supports the continuation of the US-dominated East Asian regional order against China's quest for a China-led East Asian regional order. Therefore, containment of China rather than accommodation became a diplomatic strategy for Japan⁷⁴). These steps were nothing but overarching claim to acting firmly based on the national interests.

4.3 Wedging open the door to a normal state

Post-war Japan was far from a 'normal' nation. Like Germany, Japan had long committed to the antimilitarism dictated by its peace Constitution which had the effect of reassuring many Japanese and the world that there would not be a resurgence of the militarism that had marked the pre-war period. Japanese abnormality in the security policy "appeared to be deeply embedded in Japanese society, remaining unchallenged until the 1990s"⁷⁵). Yet, Japanese abnormality was more ambiguous and controversial than German one. It was not only because there was discrepancy in Japanese security policy that permitted divided elements in Japanese society, but also because Japan's foreign policy was, to a large extent, based on "mixture of guile and goodwill"⁷⁶). Put simply, in contrast to Germany which suppressed its national interests by multilateral process, Japan behaved 'more or less' like normal state in a sense that it was seeking to maximize its economic interests which was largely tied to economic assistance, which would result in, Japan hoped simply, the promotion of common interest and reconciliation.

Therefore, Japan can be described as ‘not quite abnormal’ or ‘semi-abnormal’: ‘abnormal’ in the security policy, but ‘normal’ in the foreign policy. Japan seemed to content itself with becoming a ‘normal’ economic power and not striving for a kind of ‘normalization’ that included getting ready for war⁷⁷). However, the discrepancy in Japanese security policy and the attitude of ‘mixture of guile and goodwill’—which had given Japan a ‘dual identity’—did not help its neighbors to withhold “their suspicion to Japanese real intention (honno), while making them to wonder what Japan’s real face was”⁷⁸). For this reason, Japanese efforts to be a peace nation and its goodwill were not well recognized and appreciated by its neighbors. Rather, Japanese dual identity became one of main sources of regional instability.

The first half of the 1990s was the turning point for major movement to normalization. Like Germany, after the Gulf war, Japan sought normalization in the security field, being more active to peacekeeping, international rescue and relief, and economic reconstruction largely on the basis of the notion of human security. On the other hand, Japan focused on promoting common interests with its neighbors in East Asia, by envisioning the regional institution building and nurturing a reconciliation. As British diplomat Cooper described Japan as a post-Westphalian nation-state, Japan seemed to resemble Germany as a *semi-normal state*⁷⁹).

Unfortunately, a semi-normal status was “tainted and hijacked by the trend of the rightward drift”⁸⁰), while it did not last long time. Japan has incrementally experienced substantial movement toward the normalization in its foreign and security policy. Japan under the leadership of Koizumi and Abe has explicitly and regularly campaigned to enhance Japan’s military power to a level commensurate with its economic heft. In particular, in October 2013 Abe mentioned assertively, “I’ve realized that Japan is expected to exert leadership not just on the economic front, but also in the field of security in the Asia-Pacific”⁸¹). Indeed, Abe has effectively opened the door to a normal state in the security field. Meanwhile, the heightened expectation in building common interests with its neighbors was followed by stunning disappointment in the 2000s. Economic assistance and interdependence with its neighbors did little to assuage the resentment and even hostility toward the Japanese. In addition, as the hyper-growth of China has reduced the relative influence of Japan’s regional economic power and Japanese national interests have been challenged by China, the pursuit of a semi-normal state has been dwindling away. Japan’s long-standing focus on economic diplomacy and its attitude of ‘mixture of guile and goodwill’ have been supplemented with its more self-assertive and self-interested policies. As a consequence, Japan is getting nearer to a ‘normal state.’

5. Conclusion

Pre-war Germany and Japan attempted to catch other Western powers up and searched for their identity, but their repercussions were the emergence of authoritarian states committed to territorial expansion as non-status quo or super-normal powers pushing towards obsessed militarism and national interests. In the end, Germany and Japan defeated by the United States and its allies in 1945 became atypical, so-called ‘abnormal,’ cultivating the unique ‘culture of restraint.’ According to Schwartz, Germany and Japan have evolved from Machtbesessenheit (self-aggrandizement before 1945) to Machtvergessenheit (an abstention from power politics after 1945)⁸²). Their experiences contributed a new vision and model towards the peaceful development of international community.

Yet, the characteristic of abnormality and the path to normalization of Germany and Japan are different. Post-war Germany was a ‘perfect abnormal state’ that was not interested in the use of force and explicitly pursued its Gemeinwohl, whereas post-war Japan was a ‘semi-abnormal state’ in a sense that Japan was not only ‘abnormal’ because of its de-emphasizing military power but also ‘normal’ because of the embodiment of its national interests exclusively by means of economic diplomacy. However, the end of the cold war enkindled anxieties about the would-be normalization of German and Japanese abnormality. Both Germany and Japan, pressured to play important roles in international peace and security by their allies, had been giving way steadily to ‘normalization’ in the security policy and, in the meantime, Japan strove for a kind of formation of common interests with its neighbors in the similar manner of Germany. In this sense, both Germany and Japan in the 1990s became, in a little while, semi-normal states which are less reluctant to participate in military missions and adopt their identity in a practice of common interests. Nonetheless, in the security policy, Germany which, after the short-lived normalization, has not kept up its normalization since the mid-2000s, while Japan has made considerable headway in bringing back the normality since the late-1990s. In the foreign policy, both of them have become more assertive, reinforcing the long-standing image as ‘economic power,’ while behaving in the same way as the others with their own temptation and purpose. Germany, being uniquely positioned to fashion milieu goals and exercise leadership in Europe, becomes a semi-abnormal state, while Japan, challenged by the rise of China and the emergence of multipolar rivalry in East Asia, is on the verge of a normal state.

For Germany and Japan, it seems that normalization in the security policy had been an undesirable process because of the terrible memories of war. However, right after the end of the cold war, there had been normalization in both countries which represented deviations from the military-abnormality of the cold war. However, the normalization in Germany was momentary, whereas in Japan it was durable. The reasons Germany has illustrated with particular clarity the deep-seated antimilitarism and, in sharp contrast, Japan has been transgressing its antimilitarist norm have to do with a ‘historical learning process’ and a continuous public deliberation about the past. For Germany, antimilitarism in Germany is based on a sharp break with the past from which the appropriate lessons have been drawn. The events of the Second World War including Holocaust represented a seminal episode that profoundly forced Germany to change its militaristic tradition and to confront critically the past. Owing to an incessant public reflection and education on the past, the impact of Germany’s history still remains a cornerstone of the political discourse. In this sense, Germany did not go further into the movement toward normalization in the security policy. In contrast to German case, Japanese antimilitarism is less well-grounded than German one, given that Japan has been not quite successful to make a rupture with the past—in other words, as Inoguchi contended, Japan’s national identity is thoroughly “embedded in the continuity and purpose of the modern history of the nation”⁸³) Japan has failed to execute rigorously the historical learning process—for instance, the Japanese Ministry of Education distorts the facts of World War II in their history textbooks and high ranking Japanese officials publicly deny the occurrence of the Nanking Massacre and refuse to recognize comfort women as sexual slaves. Some Japanese, based on nationalist ideas of restoring pride and honor, give credit to the argument that because the Constitution was forcefully imposed by the US, Japan must amend the peace Constitution, namely, the prime axiom of Japanese antimilitarism. As a consequence, it is obvious that Japan, less convicted for maintaining the core value of antimilitarism, is more anxious to make Japan a normal state than Germany.

Post-war Germany pursued undeniably its Gemeinwohl, whereas post-war Japan expressed its national interests exclusively through economic diplomacy and its economic power was actually being exerted—although in the 1990s Japan was eager to seek common interests with its neighbors. Since the 2000s, both Germany and Japan have been getting more self-centered and self-assertive along with their national interests and objectives. The normalization of both nations causes ‘the fear of Germany’s reemerging hegemony’ in Europe and ‘the fear of Japanese assertiveness’ in East Asia. Their normalization has in a broader sense created a climate of instability and uncertainty in Europe and East Asia. However, despite its enhanced position of power in the center of Europe, its domineering and self-interested policy, and various, often serious disagreements with its European allies over such issues as the Eurozone, the refugee policies and the direction of European integration, Germany’s movement towards the normalization is less plagued by its neighbors’ mistrust than Japanese one, given the fact that Germany still remains committed to preserving its integration with Europe and searches for the building of cooperative relations with its neighbors. In the case of Japan, it has not so much had the political will of directly and outspokenly promoting common interests and accumulating mutual trust. Rather, Japan has implicitly and allusively kept a longing for deepening common interests through economic assistance and interdependence, or Japan has pursued the common interests which are largely tactical and instrumental in nature, aiming at providing short-term solutions to specific problems, usually economic in nature. Accordingly, the Japanese movement towards the normalization is more vulnerable to its neighbors’ criticism and suspicion against Japan’s underlying motivations and intentions than German case.

- 1) Michel Foucault, Madness and Civilization (New York: Vintage, 2013).
- 2) Kevin Dutton, The Wisdom of Psychopaths (New York: Scientific American, 2012).
- 3) Linus Hagström, “Normalizing Japan: Supporter, Nuisance, or Wielder of Power in the North Korean Nuclear Talks?” Asian Survey, vol.49, no.5 (2009), pp.831-851; Linus Hagström, “The abnormal state: Identity, norm/exception and Japan,” European Journal of International Relations, vol.1, no.24 (2015), pp. 122-145; Thomas Berger, “From Sword to Chrysanthemum: Japan’s Culture of Anti-militarism,” International Security, vol.17, no.4 (1993), pp.119-150; Thomas Berger, “Norms, Identity, and National Security in Germany and Japan,” in Peter Katzenstein ed., The Culture of National Security (New York: Columbia University Press, 1996); Thomas Berger, Cultures of Antimilitarism: National Security in Germany and Japan (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998); Peter Katzenstein ed., The Culture of National Security: Norms and Identity in World Politics (New York: Columbia University Press, 1996); Thomas Berger, “A Perfectly Normal Abnormality: German Foreign Policy after Kosovo and Afghanistan,” Japanese Journal of Political Science, vol.3, no.2 (2002), pp.173-193; Takashi Inoguchi and Paul Bacon “Sovereignties: Westphalian, liberal and anti-utopian,” International Relations of the Asia-Pacific, vol.1, (2001), pp.285-304.
- 4) Hanns Maull, “Germany and Japan: The New Civilian Powers,” Foreign Affairs (Winter, 1990/91), pp.91-106.
- 5) Berger, op. cit. (1998)
- 6) Thomas Banchoff, The German Problem Transformed: Institutions, Politics and Foreign Policy, 1945-1995 (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1999).
- 7) Julian Dierkes, Postwar History Education in Japan and the Germanys: Guilty Lessons (Routledge: London, 2010).
- 8) Peter Katzenstein ed., Tamed Power: Germany in Europe (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1997); Peter Katzenstein, A World of Region: Asia and Europe (Ithaca: Cornell University, 2005).

- 9) Andrew Oros, Normalizing Japan: Politics, Identity and the Evolution of Security Practice (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2008).
- 10) Stephen Krasner, Sovereignty: Organized Hypocrisy (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1999), p.72
- 11) Henry Kissinger, Diplomacy (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2011), p.912.
- 12) Yoichiro Sato and Keiko Hirata, Norms, Interests, and Power in Japanese Foreign Policy (New York: Palgrave MacMillan, 2008).
- 13) Charter of the United States (24 October, 1945).
- 14) David Baldwin, Economic Statecraft (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1985).
- 15) Hans Morgenthau, Politics Among Nations (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1948); Reinhold Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society (London: SCM Press, 1947).
- 16) H. Biehl, B. Giegerich and A. Jones eds., Strategic Cultures in Europe: Security and Defence Policies across the Continent (Potsdam: Springer, 2013), p.12
- 17) Hisashi Owada, "In Search of a New National Identity: An Analysis of the National Psyche of Post-war Japan," Rien T. Segers ed., A New Japan for the Twenty-First Century: An Inside Overview of Current Fundamental Changes and Problems (Routledge Contemporary Japan Series, 2008)
- 18) Robert Rosecrance, The Rise of the Trading State: Commerce and Conquest in the Modern World (New York: Basic Books, 1986).
- 19) Yoichi Funabashi, "Japan and the new world order," Foreign Affairs, vol.70, no.5 (1991/1992), pp.58-74.
- 20) Yoshihide Soeya, Nihonno midoru pawa [Japan's middle power diplomacy] (Tokyo: Sakura shinsho, 2005).
- 21) Eric Heginbotham, and Richard Samuels, "Mercantile Realism and Japanese Foreign Policy," International Security, vol.22, no.4 (1998), pp.171-203.
- 22) Tsuyoshi Kawasaki, "Postclassical realism and Japanese security policy," The Pacific Review, vol.14, no.2 (2001), pp.221-240.
- 23) Jennifer Lind, "Pacifism or passing the buck: Testing theories of Japanese security policy," International Security, vol.29, no.1 (2004), pp.92-121.
- 24) Thomas Diez and Ian Manners "Reflecting on Normative Power Europe," F. Berenskoetter and M. J. Williams eds., Power in World Politics (New York: Routledge, 2007), p.175.
- 25) Margaret Thatcher, The Downing Street Years (London: Harper Collins, 1993), p.791.
- 26) Winkler Heinrich August, Germany: The Long Road West. Volume II: 1933-1990 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007), p.571.
- 27) Katzenstein, op. cit. (2005), p.96.
- 28) Andrei Markovits and Simon Reich, The German Predicament (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1997), p.34.
- 29) Basic Law for Federal Republic of Germany (23 May, 1949).
- 30) Russell Miller, "Germany's Basic Law and the Use of Force," Indiana Journal of Global Legal Studies, vol.17, no.2 (2010), p.200.
- 31) Basic Law, op. cit.
- 32) Berger, op. cit. (1996), p.332; Adrian Hyde-Price, "Foreign and Security Policy," Stephen Padgett eds., Developments in German Politics 3 (Durham: Duke University Press, 2003), p.186.
- 33) European Economic Community, Treaty of Rome (Luxembourg: Office for Official Publication of the European Communities, 1957).

- 34) Peter Pulzer, German Politics, 1945-1995 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995), p.59.
- 35) William Paterson, "Does Germany Still Have a European Vocation?" German Politics, vol.19, no.1 (2010), pp.41-52.
- 36) Sam-Sang Jo, "Region-Building and Critical Juncture: Europe and Northeast Asia in Comparative Perspective," Asia Europe Journal, vol.10, no.1 (2012), p.8.
- 37) Hyde-Price, op. cit. (2003), pp.185-188.
- 38) Alister Miskimmon, "Falling into line? Kosovo and the course of German foreign policy," International Affairs, vol.85, no.3 (2009), p.561.
- 39) German Minister of Defense, White Paper on German Security Policy and the Future of the Bundeswehr (Berlin: Ministry of Defence, 2006).
- 40) R. Cohen, "Germany Is Bolder, Irritating Its Allies," New York Times (12 December, 1998).
- 41) Sebastian Harnisch and Siegfried Schieder, "Germany's New European Policy: Weaker, Leaner, Meaner," Hanns Maull ed., Germany's Uncertain Power: Foreign Policy of the Berlin Republic (New York: Palgrave, 2006), pp.95-108.
- 42) George Soros, The Tragedy of the European Union (New York: PublicAffairs, 2014), pp.17-18.
- 43) Stefan Kornelius, Angela Merkel: The Chancellor and Her World (London: Alma Books LTD, 2013), p.23.
- 44) Ulrich Krotz and Joachim Schild, Shaping Europe: France, Germany and Embedded Bilateralism from the Elysée Treaty to Twenty-First Century Politics (London: Oxford University Press, 2015), pp.208-209.
- 45) Ulrich Beck, "Merkel the European will wake up," The Guardian (2 September, 2013).
- 46) Christopher Hill, The Actors in Europe's Foreign Policy (London: Routledge, 1996), p.11.
- 47) William Wallace, "Germany at the Centre of Europe," Eva Kolinsky ed., The Federal Republic of Germany: The End of an Era (New York: Berg, 1991), pp.169-170.
- 48) Jürgen Habermas, "Germany and the Euro-Crisis." The Nation (June 28, 2010), p.19.
- 49) Kenzaburo Oe, Aimaina Nihnono watashi [Japan, the Ambiguous and Myself] (Tokyo: Iwanami shoten, 1995), p.8.
- 50) Gavan McCormack, "New Tunes for an Old Song: Nationalism and Identity in Post-Cold War Japan," Roy Starrs ed., Nations Under Siege: Globalization and Nationalism in Asia (New York: Palgrave, 2001), p.159.
- 51) Heginbotham and Samuels, op. cit. (1998).
- 52) The Constitution of Japan (3 November, 1946).
- 53) Frances Rosenbluth, Tun Saito and Annalisa Zinn, "America's Policy toward East Asia: How It Looks from Japan," Asian Survey, vol.47, no.4, (2007), p. 593; David Arase, "Japan, the Active State?: Security Policy after 9/11," Asian Survey, vol.47, no.4 (2007), p.562.
- 54) Takeshi Igarashi, "Heiwakokkato Nihongata gaiko [Peace Nation and Japanese Style of Diplomacy]," Nakamura Masanori ed., Sengo kaikakuto sonoisan [The Post-War Reform and its Legacy] (Tokyo: Iwanami shoten, 2005), p.276.
- 55) Yoshihide Soeya, Masayuki Tadokoro, and David Welch, "Introduction: What Is a 'Normal Country'?" Yoshihide Soeya et al. eds., Japan as a 'Normal Country' (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2011), p.5.
- 56) Soeya, op. cit. (2005), p.17.
- 57) Kenneth Pyle, "Profound Forces in the Making of Modern Japan," Journal of Japanese Studies, vol.32, no.2 (2006), p.413.

- 58) T. J. Pempel, "Japanese Strategy under Koizumi," Gilbert Rozman et al. eds., Japanese Strategic Thought toward Asia (New York: Palgrave, 2007), p.111.
- 59) Akihiko Tanaka, Ajiano nakano Nihon [Japan in Asia] (Tokyo: NTT, 2007); Chalmers Johnson, "Japan in Search of a "Normal" Role," Daedalus, vol.121, no.4 (1992), p.2.
- 60) Hagström, op. cit. (2009), pp.850-851; Robert Wade, "Japan, the World Bank and the art of paradigm maintenance," New Left Review, vol.217 (1996), pp.3-37.
- 61) Igarashi, op. cit. (2005), p.279; Zhimin Ni, "Ohira naikauni okeru daiichiji taichu seifu shakutai [Prime Minister Ohira's first ODA to China]," Keizikaku ronshu [Journal of Economics], vol.142, no.5 (2003), p.47.
- 62) Taku Tamaki, "The persistence of reified Asia as reality in Japanese foreign policy narratives," The Pacific Review, vol.28, no.1 (2015), p.26.
- 63) Pempel, op. cit., p.111.
- 64) Mark Peattie, "Introduction," Ramon Myers and Mark Peattie eds., The Japanese Colonial Empire: 1895-1945 (Princeton, N.J. : Princeton University Press, 1984), pp.24-25.
- 65) Tsuyoshi Hasegawa, "Japan's Strategic Thinking toward Asia In the First Half of the 1990s," Gilbert Rozman, Kazuhiko Togo, and Joseph Ferguson eds., Japanese Strategic Thought toward Asia (New York: Palgrave, 2007), pp.59-60.
- 66) Asahi Shinbun, "93nen jieitai sankano kanbojia PKO: hojinkeigo gokenha shushono kuno [SDF's participation in Cambodian PKO mission in 1992: the pacifist prime minister's agony to protect Japanese nationals]," (5 June, 2017).
- 67) Takashi Inoguchi, "Japanese Strategic Thought toward Asia in the 1980s," Gilbert Rozman, Kazuhiko Togo, and Joseph Ferguson eds., Japanese Strategic Thought toward Asia (New York: Palgrave, 2007); Bhubhindar Singh "Japan's post-Cold War security policy: Bringing back the normal state," Contemporary Southeast Asia, vol.24, no.1 (2002), pp.82-105.
- 68) Koichi Nakano, Ukeikasuru Nihonseiji [The Rightward Shift of Japanese Politics] (Tokyo: Iwanami shoten, 2015), pp.114-152; Christopher Hughes, Japan's Foreign and Security Policy Under the 'Abe Doctrine' : New Dynamism or New Dead End? (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2015), pp.10-11.
- 69) Sam-Sang Jo, "The Blind Men, the Elephant and Regional Order in Northeast Asia: Towards a New Conceptualization," Japanese Journal of Political Science, vol.10, no.4 (2015), p.523; David Welch, "Embracing Normalcy: Toward a Japanese National Strategy," Yoshihide Soeya et al. eds., Japan as a 'Normal Country' (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2011), pp.21-23.
- 70) Tomiichi Murayama, "Murayama naikaku soridaijin danwa: Sengo 50shunenno shusen kinenbini atatte [Statement by Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama: On the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the war's end]," (Ministry of Foreign Affairs), (15 August, 1995).
- 71) Inoguchi, op. cit. (2007), p.50.
- 72) Sheila Smith, Intimate Rivals: Japanese Domestic Politics and a Rising China (New York: Columbia University Press, 2015), pp.255-256.
- 73) ibid., p.237; Pempel, op. cit., pp.118-119.
- 74) Hasegawa, op. cit., p.68; Welch, op. cit., p.20.

- 75) Masayuki Tadokoro, "Change and Continuity in Japan's 'Abnormalcy': An Emerging External Attitude of the Japanese Public," Yoshihide Soeya et al. eds., Japan as a 'Normal Country' (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2011), p.43.
- 76) Katzenstein, op. cit. (2005), p.101.
- 77) Hagström, op. cit. (2009), p.851.
- 78) Soeya, op. cit. (2005), p.27.
- 79) Robert Cooper, Breaking of Nations (London: Atlantic Books, 2003), p.41.
- 80) Yoshihide Soeya, "Futsunokuni ronsaiko [Reevaluating Normal State]" Hogaku kenkyu [Journal of Law], vol.83, no.3 (2010), p.36.
- 81) Gerard Baker and George Nishiyama, "Abe Says Japan Ready to Counter China's Power," The Wall Street Journal (26 October, 2013).
- 82) Schwartz Hans-Peter, Die gezähmten Deutschen: Von der Machtbesessenheit zur Machtvergessenheit (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1985).
- 83) Takashi Inoguchi, "Japan's Foreign Policy Line after the Cold War," Takashi Inoguchi and G. John Ikenberry eds., The Troubled Triangle: Economic and Security Concerns for the United States, Japan, and China (New York palgrave macmillan, 2013), p.48.